Building together for a brighter future

The ‘rainbow nation’ is a term coined by Nobel Peace Prize winner Archbishop Desmond Tutu which captures the extraordinary diversity of races, tribes, creeds, languages and landscapes that characterise modern South Africa. It is suggesting of hope and promise. Yet the after-effects of the country’s divisive past are still with us and the goal of racial harmony remains elusive. The constitutional court has the difficult task of extending and protecting human rights in a society in the throes of transition and faced with serious problems of unemployment, poverty and HIV/AIDS.

Housing in South Africa reflects the inequalities in wealth the still exist between the country’s rich and poor. Some homes rival the most imposing in the world; there are mansions, security villages, golf estates and neat suburban rows. But tin shanties and ‘informal’ or squatter settlements blight most South African cities and towns. In 2010, there were some 2700 of these informal settlements, accommodating over 1.2 million households.

Desiree Jean Philander and her husband Donovan Philander have been waiting for their home to be built for 19 years. The couple have four adult children and two grandchildren that all used to stay in a very small dwelling, not big enough for the whole family. The area in which they used to stay struggled with crime so the family were eager to move to a safer area, especially because of the young children. Desiree receives a disability grant from the government that contributes towards the household income. She is very sickly and often has to go to the hospital. Life for this family has been very hard but in March 2014 they finally saw the beginning of their long awaited dream, when their new house was built by Habitat.

The final tile being laid on the roof by the two sons of the family was extremely poignant. Having never had a secure roof capable of keeping out the rain before, the significance was not lost on anyone. Together, we were creating a better future for this incredibly deserving family.
